Perennial Fruiting Trees & Shrubs

Fall and Winter are the best seasons to plant perennial trees, shrubs and bushes.

Even though above-ground growth winds down and goes dormant, below-ground growth is still very active. Soil is a tremendous heat sink and even though air temperatures go from cool to cold to freezing, the soil temperature is much more moderate and conducive to root development.

Perennials that are planted in the fall will be off to a better start the following spring, benefiting from the months they were able to get their anchor and feeder roots established before the above-ground plant parts start calling for water and nutrients as they break dormancy. Besides, who can argue that working outside in the fall and nice winter days is a great way to get some exercise & sunshine without feeling like you're going to melt as is typical in spring and summer.
